CHANGE THE STAKES
BECAUSE A GOOD EDUCATION CAN'T BE MEASURED BY A TEST SCORE

Williamsburg and Greenpoint Parents
for Our Public Schools
(WAGPOPS)

We know what we're against:

- the "High Stakes" attached to testing
- 6 days of ELA & Math testing
- a culture that values test prep over joy of learning
- poorly constructed tests
- lack of transparency
- a private company profiting off testing

We know what we're for:

- an end to "High Stakes" test uses
- a dramatic reduction in the amount of testing
- implementation of educationally sound assessments
- greater transparency so that test results can guide teaching & learning

But how do we get there?

- targeted protests
- social media & petitions
- opting out
- lobbying Congress
- building alliances
- propose new testing practices that put the focus back on learning
- YOUR IDEA HERE!

This year not only parents but also educators across Florida are rebelling. They have joined a national protest in which states have repealed their graduation test requirements, postponed the consequences of testing for the Common Core – national standards in more than 40 states – and rolled back the number of required exams.

"In August, Education Secretary Arne Duncan added to the chorus when he wrote in a blog post that 'testing issues today are sucking the oxygen out of the room in a lot of schools,' and that teachers needed more time to adapt to new standards and tests."

- The New York Times, 11/9/14

What began with protests over 'high-stakes testing' and cheating scandals in various public-school districts in the mid-2000s has morphed in the past six months into an outright mutiny, driven in large part by the controversial rollout of Common Core State Standards, which are linked to new state curriculums, more-difficult tests and new teacher evaluations."
